MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER DENYING BRUNSWICK HOMES, LLC'S
MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

I. INTRODUCTION

Before this court is the motion for summary judgment [doc. no. 39] ("MSJ") of Brunswick Homes, LLC ("Brunswick") in the above-referenced removed action (an action that was originally filed prepetition in state court) in which Jeffrey H. Mims ("Trustee") now stands in the shoes of creditor, The Cadle Company ("Cadle") (hereinafter, collectively, "Plaintiffs"). In the action, Plaintiffs are suing the various defendants, including Brunswick, on fraudulent transfer and constructive trust causes of action, and also seek the equitable remedy of reverse corporate veil piercing against JHM Properties, Inc. and Brunswick, under the theory that these entities are the alter egos of James H. Moore, III (the "Debtor" or "Mr. Moore")—the ultimate result of which theory would be to impose upon those entities the liabilities of Mr. Moore. Brunswick seeks a summary judgment that: (a) Plaintiffs' reverse corporate veil piercing remedy as to Brunswick fails as a matter of law, since (i) Moore is not a record equity interest holder of Brunswick, (ii) Brunswick has multiple (three) equity interest holders, and (iii) Brunswick was not in existence at the time Moore incurred indebtedness to Cadle; (b) Plaintiffs' constructive trust cause of action must fail as a matter of law, since there is no evidence of the three required elements to impose constructive trust; and (c) all of Plaintiffs' claims are barred by statute of limitations. This court has jurisdiction of this matter pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 1334 and 157. This is a core proceeding pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 157(b)(2)(A), (E), (H) and (O).

Summary judgment is denied. There are genuine issues of material fact in dispute (and there are relevant facts that cannot be ascertained from the summary judgment record) that bear on whether the Plaintiffs' causes of action and remedies are legally viable or not. In denying summary judgment, the court notes that the reverse corporate veil piercing remedy is the most complex aspect of Brunswick's MSJ, because: (a) Plaintiffs, indeed, propose a novel use of veil piercing, and (b) the application of it to Brunswick could have a harsh or even draconian effect on parties not before the court (i.e., the equity owners of Brunswick not named in this action and possibly creditors of Brunswick not heretofore identified). While the court has grave concern about the reverse corporate veil piercing proposed here, the court cannot hold that the theory is not viable as a matter of law, for the reasons explained below.

II. THE MATERIAL UNDISPUTED FACTS (AT LEAST BETWEEN PLAINTIFFS AND BRUNSWICK HOMES, LLC)¹

A. Mr. and Mrs. Moore and the Partition of their Marital Property.

In the Texas real estate boom of the 1980s, Mr. Moore was an active participant in and around Dallas, Texas. When the real estate market took an unfortunate downward turn in the late ¹As there are other defendants in this litigation that are not involved with the Brunswick MSJ, the court makes no presumption that all of these facts are undisputed generally.

1980s, Mr. Moore incurred millions of dollars in debt, primarily in the form of guaranty liability relating to various real estate ventures in which he had been involved. In the period from approximately November of 1988 to November 1990, Mr. Moore transferred community assets to his wife, Elizabeth Moore ("Mrs. Moore") via a post-marital partition agreement. Mr. Moore has taken the position in his bankruptcy case that much of his and Mrs. Moore's marital property is Mrs. Moore's separate property (by virtue of the post-marital partition agreement). Mrs. Moore has not filed bankruptcy along with Mr. Moore, so any separate property of hers (assuming that it is genuinely separate) is not property of the bankruptcy estate of Mr. Moore, pursuant to section 541 of the Bankruptcy Code.

B. JHM Properties, Inc.—Separate Property of Mrs. Moore or Not?

In 1991, Mrs. Moore created JHM Properties, Inc. Mr. and Mrs. Moore assert that Mrs. Moore is the sole shareholder of JHM Properties, Inc. and that only Mrs. Moore's separate property—$100,000—has been invested into JHM Properties, Inc. Shortly after the formation of JHM Properties, Inc., also in 1991, Mr. Moore's own company, James H. Moore & Associates ("JHM Associates"), ceased operation and Mr. Moore entered into an employment agreement with JHM Properties, Inc. JHM Properties, Inc., like JHM Associates, is and was in the real estate development business.

The Plaintiffs assert that Mrs. Moore is merely an interior designer, and is nothing more than a figurehead at JHM Properties, Inc., where Mr. Moore maintains complete control. The Plaintiffs assert that, by placing his wife in ownership of JHM Properties, Inc., Mr. Moore was able to shelter his assets from creditors. The Plaintiffs assert that Mr. Moore abused JHM Properties, Inc.'s corporate form in a variety of ways. The Plaintiffs point to Mr. Moore's signatory authority on JHM Properties, Inc.'s bank accounts; the cancellation of an employment agreement he had with JHM Properties, Inc. on the eve of his bankruptcy filing and then JHM Properties, Inc. rehiring him within a month of the bankruptcy filing; JHM Properties, Inc.'s payment of Mr. Moore's personal American Express Card bills; JHM Properties, Inc.'s payment of Mr. Moore's country club dues; and JHM Properties, Inc.'s payment of Mr. Moore's personal legal fees as evidence that JHM Properties, Inc. is really just a sham created to shield Mr. Moore's assets from his creditors.

C. The Cadle Company's Judgments.

On November 5, 1992, the FDIC obtained a judgment in the amount of $1,077,602.60 against Mr. Moore (the "FDIC Judgment"). The FDIC Judgment was assigned to Republic Credit One ("Republic") on July 9, 1996. On July 30, 1998, Republic took Mr. Moore's deposition and discovered Mr. Moore's involvement with Brunswick (described below) and JHM Properties, Inc. Over three years later, on September 17, 2001, Republic assigned the FDIC Judgment to Cadle. Then, Cadle, on November 25, 2003, obtained a $6,723,843.32 default judgment against Mr. Moore in its own right (the "Cadle Judgment"), relating to yet a different obligation of Mr. Moore.

D. Mr. Moore's Involvement with Brunswick.

Meanwhile, in May of 1997, Brunswick was formed by Rod Miller and Mr. Moore. The owners of Brunswick were and are: Enmark Parent Corp. (an affiliate of Rod Miller), a 49% equity owner of Brunswick; Miller GP Corp. (another affiliate of Rod Miller), a 1% equity owner of Brunswick; and JHM Properties, Inc. (as described above, allegedly 100% owned by Mrs. Moore as her separate property), a 50% equity owner of Brunswick. Despite this breakdown of ownership, Rod Miller had the right to vote 100% of the equity interests. Mr. Moore put no money or other assets into Brunswick at its formation, but was appointed President of Brunswick.

In general terms, Rod Miller was the "money man" in Brunswick and it was Mr. Moore's responsibility to generate business. At the time of Brunswick's formation, Enmark was apparently providing accounting oversight of Brunswick. However, sometime in 1999, Enmark ceased its accounting oversight of Brunswick and, during this time, it is alleged that Mr. Moore started utilizing Brunswick for improper purposes. The Plaintiffs assert that Mr. Moore controlled and manipulated Brunswick for his own benefit in an effort to defraud his creditors. Among the actions alleged in this regard were: Mr. Moore's alleged embezzlement of over $1,000,000 in funds from Brunswick; Mr. Moore's status as the man who "ran the show" at Brunswick; Mr. Moore's alleged use of $850,000 of Brunswick funds to improve his house on Bent Tree Drive in Dallas; the use of Brunswick funds by Mr. Moore to pay for golf trips and a Cadillac Escalade; and the transfer of assets by Mr. Moore into Brunswick such as property located at 2700 Brookside in McKinney, Texas (the "Brookside Property"), property located at 5524 Emerson in Dallas (the "Emerson Property"), $129,000 in settlement proceeds from a Colorado lawsuit, and the assignment of a $500,000 promissory note relating to Horseshoe Nail Ranch from Mr. Moore to Brunswick. The gist of the allegations seems to be that Mr. Moore used Brunswick (although it was legally thrice removed from him)² as his personal piggy bank—ergo Brunswick was his alter ego and its veil should be pierced so that Mr. Moore's creditors can look to the assets of Brunswick for payment of their claims.

E. Events Immediately Preceding Mr. Moore's Bankruptcy Filing.

On April 24, 2002, Rod Miller apparently caught on to Mr.

²Thrice removed, in that Mr. Moore's wife owned the stock of JHM Properties, Inc. as her separate property, and JHM Properties, Inc. was a 50% equity owner of Brunswick.

Moore's alleged self-dealing with Brunswick and demanded from Mr. Moore final accounting reports of Brunswick. The relationship between Rod Miller and Mr. Moore continued to deteriorate, resulting in Mr. Moore being fired as the president of Brunswick on December 5, 2005.

In January and March of 2005, Cadle, in connection with collection of its two judgments against Mr. Moore, deposed Rod Miller. It was during these depositions that Rod Miller, apparently for the first time, learned that it was Mrs. Moore—not Mr. Moore—who owned JHM Properties, Inc. On April 5, 2005, Cadle filed the above-referenced action in state court, which was later removed to become this adversary proceeding. As the action before the state court was progressing toward trial in early-to-mid-2006, three events occurred in relatively quick succession: On April 25, 2006, Mr. Moore's long-time employment contract with JHM Properties, Inc. was terminated; on May 2, 2006, Mr. Moore filed the instant Chapter 7 case; and on June 1, 2006, Mr. Moore entered into a new employment agreement with JHM Properties, Inc. and with Rubicon (another Elizabeth Moore entity). Most of the summary judgment evidence relied upon by Brunswick is in the form of deposition testimony.

III. LEGAL ANALYSIS

A. Summary Judgment Standard

Summary judgment is appropriate if "the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). "A summary judgment motion is properly granted only when, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, the record indicates that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact." Am. Home Assurance Co. v. United Space Alliance, LLC, 378 F.3d 482, 486 (5th Cir. 2004). The materiality of facts is governed by substantive law, and only facts that might affect the outcome of the suit will preclude summary judgment. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248 (1986). In summary, the court must review the factual and legal issues presented in Brunswick's MSJ in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs. This court may only grant summary judgment in favor of Brunswick if there is no genuine issue of material fact that would preclude summary adjudication for Brunswick. Otherwise, the court must deny summary judgment. This is a high hurdle to meet.

The most challenging issue posed in the MSJ, distilled to its essence, is whether Plaintiffs can avail themselves to the remedy of reverse corporate veil piercing with respect to Brunswick—so that Brunswick's assets may be looked to for payment of the obligations of Mr. Moore—when Mr. Moore was not and is not a record equity interest owner of Brunswick. If the remedy is not available as a matter of law in this context, then, of course, dismissal of the count of Plaintiffs' Complaint seeking this remedy is appropriate. Thus, the court must examine: (1) whether there is such a remedy of "reverse corporate veil piercing" recognized under Texas law³ and, if so, (2) whether it can be applied when the individual whose obligations are involved (Mr. Moore) was/is not even an equity owner of the business enterprise whose assets might be reached.

The court holds that, while the notion of reverse corporate veil piercing, frankly, has rather thin roots in Texas jurisprudence (if one peels back the onion—as this court has done below), and while it is a rather unusual concept that surely must be cautiously applied (to avoid trampling on due process rights of those not before the court), the theory has been recognized as a viable theory under Texas law by the Fifth Circuit. Zahra Spiritual Trust v. United States, 910 F.2d 240, 243 (5th Cir. 1990). Moreover, Zahra instructs that while equity ownership is a traditional requirement to apply reverse corporate veil piercing, the remedy may be appropriate even where the individual ³As courts are required to apply the law of incorporation to corporate veil issues, the court will analyze Texas law in the case at bar. Jefferson Pilot Broadcasting Co. v. Hilary & Hogan, Inc., 617 F.2d 133, 135 (5th Cir. 1980). The entities involved in this adversary proceeding (JHM Properties, Inc. and Brunswick) are a Texas corporation and limited liability company, respectively.

whose liability is involved (here, Mr. Moore) was not a record or nominal equity owner of the entity to be pierced—for example if the individual had/has a de facto ownership in the corporation.⁴ Since Plaintiffs plead, essentially, that Mr. Moore has or had a de facto interest in Brunswick (albeit thrice removed, allegedly through his own contrivances), their count for reverse corporate veil piercing survives dismissal. A trial on the merits is appropriate to determine whether Mr. Moore had a de facto interest in Brunswick and whether the standards for application of reverse corporate piercing can otherwise be established by Plaintiffs.

B. The Evolution and Efficacy of the Doctrine of "Reverse Corporate Veil Piercing."

The court starts by noting the general principle, long imbedded in our corporate laws, that a parent corporation (or shareholder) is not liable for the acts of its subsidiary. United States v. Bestfoods, 524 U.S. 51 (1998). In fact, one of the principal objectives of the formation of corporations (or business entities such as limited liability companies) is to isolate liabilities among separate entities. Thus, it is a basic ⁴In the case at bar, Brunswick is a Texas limited liability company ("LLC"), not a corporation, but the court discusses herein the body of case law dealing with "alter ego" and veil piercing in the context of corporations. The court believes that whether a business enterprise is an LLC or a corporation is a distinction without a difference in this context.

proposition that corporate veils exist for a reason—to separate and isolate—and should only be pierced reluctantly. However, exceptions have emerged in the common law. Most notable is the “alter ego doctrine.”

1. Texas Supreme Court’s Recognition of the Alter Ego Doctrine and the “Traditional” Corporate Veil Piercing Remedy.

In 1986, the Texas Supreme Court issued its now-famous opinion in Castleberry v. Branscum, 721 S.W.2d 270 (Tex. 1986) that articulated the “alter ego doctrine.” In that opinion, the Texas Supreme Court held that the alter ego doctrine may be applied to disregard a corporate entity (and hold a shareholder liable for the debts of a corporation) when: (1) there is such a unity between a corporation and an individual that the separateness of the corporation has ceased; and (2) holding only the corporation liable would result in injustice. The court explained that the so-called alter ego doctrine (or a finding of alter ego) is one basis out of seven for disregarding a corporate fiction. The court added that whether the alter ego doctrine applies depends on the following factors: the total dealings of the corporation and the individual, including the degree to which corporate formalities have been followed and corporate and individual property have been kept separately; the amount of financial interest, ownership and control the individual maintains over the corporation; and whether the corporation has been used for personal purposes. Id. at 272. Thus, Castleberry was the Texas Supreme Court's rubber stamp on the legal viability of the remedy of traditional corporate veil piercing (i.e., disregarding a corporate veil to hold a shareholder liable for obligations of a corporation).

The Fifth Circuit later referred to Castleberry as "puzzling" in the case of Pan Eastern Exploration Co. v. Hufo, 855 F.2d 1106, 1131 (5th Cir. 1988), with its "laundry list of seven relatively detailed rationales that intertwine and overlap, yet point in different directions." The Fifth Circuit indicated that it thought there were three distinct strands of corporate disregard under Texas law: (1) alter ego proper—where a corporation is operated as a mere tool or business conduit of another; (2) illegal purpose—use of the corporation "as a technique for avoiding legal limitations on natural persons or corporations"; (3) sham to perpetrate a fraud. Id. at 1131-33.⁵

⁵ In addition to application of the alter ego doctrine to hold a shareholder liable for the debts of a corporation, the doctrine has been applied to hold one corporation liable for another corporation's debts. In such situations, courts have considered the following factors to determine whether an "alter ego" situation exists and there should be disregard of corporate separateness:

- (1) identity of shareholder, directors, officer, or employees between the corporations;
- (2) failure to distinguish in ordinary business dealings between the corporations;
- (3) operating of one corporation is provided by the other;
- (4) extent to which books and records have been kept;
- (5) whether the two corporations have common business departments;
- (6) whether the two corporations have separate meetings of

2. The Texas Legislature's Limitation on the Scope of Castleberry.

Notably, not long after Castleberry, the Texas Legislature reacted, and it reacted rather significantly. It did so by amending Article 2.21 of the Texas Business Corporation Act (a statute entitled "Liability of Subscribers and Shareholders")⁶ shareholders and directors;

(7) whether an officer or director of one corporation is permitted to determine the policies of the other;

(8) whether the corporations file consolidated tax returns;

(9) any other facts that suggest that one entity is the mere conduit of the other.

J. Maxwell Tucker, Substantive Consolidation Under the Microscope, 25TH ANNUAL BANKRUPTCY CONFERENCE, UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS SCHOOL OF LAW, pp 3-4 (Nov. 2006) (citing Stewart & Stevenson v. Serv-Tech, Inc., 879 S.W.2d 89, 107(Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 1994, pet. denied); Salazar v. Coastal Corp., 928 S.W.2d 162, 169-70 (Tex. App.—Houston [14th Dist.] 1996, no writ), Lachalet Int'l Inc. v. Nowik, 787 S.W.2d 101, 107(Tex. App.—Dallas 1990, no writ)).

⁶Specifically, in 1989, the Texas Legislature significantly amended Article 2.21 of the Texas Business Corporation Act, with further amendments occurring in 1993 and 1997. In 1989, the legislature added a provision in Art. 2.21(A) limiting alter ego liability (with respect to contractual debts of a corporation) to situations where there was an actual fraud perpetrated on the obligee for the direct benefit of the perpetrator. 1989 Tex. Sess. Law Serv., 71st Leg., Ch. 217, § 1 (West). In 1993, the legislature added language to Art. 2.21(B) making the liability set forth in Art. 2.21(A) the exclusive liability, preempting any other alter ego liability under common law or otherwise. 1993 Tex. Sess. Law Serv., 73rd Leg., Ch. 215, § 2.05 (West). In 1997, the legislature added "affiliates" of the corporation, of the shareholders, of the owners of beneficial interests in shares, and subscribers of shares to the list of parties to whom § 2.21(A) applies (which, as of 1993, already included shareholders, beneficial interest holders, and subscribers of shares). 1997 Tex. Sess. Law Serv., 75th Leg., Ch. 375, § 7 (West). The Texas Legislature has, therefore, limited the availability of the alter ego doctrine (i.e., in the context of traditional veil piercing, and with respect to contractual which modified substantially the common law as it was developing in Texas, with regard to traditional corporate veil piercing—i.e., in the context of making a shareholder liable for a corporation's contractual debts. Whereas the common law, as articulated in Castleberry, was that a shareholder might be liable for a corporation's debt if there was such a unity between the corporation and an individual, so that the corporation had ceased to be a separate entity, and if allowing the individual to avoid liability through the use of the corporate form would work an injustice, Article 2.21 changed this, so that a shareholder (or an affiliate of the shareholder or of the corporation, for that matter) now will not be liable for the corporation's contractual debts under the theory that it is the "alter ego" of the corporation (or on the basis of any actual or constructive fraud or a sham to perpetrate a fraud, or other similar theory) unless an obligee of the corporation demonstrates that the shareholder/affiliate "caused the corporation to be used for the purpose of perpetrating and did perpetrate an actual fraud on the obligee primarily for the direct personal benefit" of the shareholder/affiliate (emphasis added). Thus, a plaintiff (i.e., creditor of a corporation) attempting to veil-pierce and impose a corporation's contractual liability on a shareholder/affiliate has to show both: (a) that the shareholder/affiliate used the corporation to perpetrate an actual fraud on the creditor of the corporation (constructive fraud is insufficient); and (b) it was primarily for the direct personal benefit of the shareholder/affiliate. The statute makes rather clear that a simple failure to observe corporate formalities (with the specter of some injustice or inequity) is not enough to impose liability on the shareholders/affiliates of a corporation for the corporation's contractual obligations. The statute clearly preempts the common law that evolved prior to the statute. See subsection B ("The liability of a [shareholder/affiliate] for an obligation that is limited [by this statute] is exclusive and preempts any other liability imposed on a [shareholder/affiliate] for that obligation under common law or otherwise . . .").

In summary, under the common law prior to the amendments to Article 2.21 of the Texas Business Corporation Act, a certain finding of fact (alter ego/lack of separateness), coupled with equitable considerations (injustice/unfairness), would create grounds for disregarding a corporate veil. However, the Texas Legislature clearly aborted the course that the common law had taken, when the amendments to Article 2.21 were enacted—reflecting a desire of the legislature that there be a tougher standard of "actual fraud" for the "direct personal benefit" of the shareholder/affiliate in order to impose contractual corporate liabilities onto an individual shareholder/affiliate.

3. Meanwhile, Enter the Fifth Circuit in Validating the Notion of Reverse Corporate Veil Piercing.

It appears that the Texas Supreme Court (and the Texas Legislature, for that matter) have never opined about what is really a very different concept: reverse corporate veil piercing.⁷ However, the Fifth Circuit first acknowledged reverse veil piercing as a viable legal theory in Texas in 1990, in the Zahra case. Zahra Spiritual Trust v. United States, 910 F.2d 240, 243 (5th Cir. 1990).

In Zahra, the Fifth Circuit first noted that the Texas Supreme Court had acknowledged in the case of Castleberry that owners of corporations who fail to maintain full legal formalities cannot expect to enjoy the limited liability that flows from the corporate form. In other words, Castleberry discussed that the traditional goal of veil piercing is to hold individuals liable for the debts of a corporation. The Fifth Circuit then discussed that the situation of reverse-veil-piercing presents something unique and unusual—applying the traditional veil piercing doctrine in reverse, so that a corporation's assets are held accountable for the liabilities of individuals who treated the corporation as their alter ego.

⁷It appears to this court that Article 2.21 addresses upstream liability (liability of a shareholder of the corporation); sideways liability (liability of a sister of the corporation, as a sister would be an "affiliate"); and perhaps even downstream liability (liability of a subsidiary of a corporation, as a subsidiary would be an affiliate) with respect to contractual corporate debt. The problem is that Article 2.21 does not speak to holding a corporation liable for an individual's contractual debt. Thus, the Texas Legislature, it appears, has not addressed the type of reverse piercing being attempted in the case at bar.

The Fifth Circuit went on to cite the following rather scant authority for the proposition that reverse corporate veil piercing has been recognized in Texas jurisprudence and in other recognized authorities: 1 W. FLETCHER, CYCLOPEDIA OF THE LAW OF PRIVATE CORPORATIONS, § 41.70, at 458-59 (1983 & Supp. 1989) (and the FLETCHER source cites a Florida intermediate appellate court opinion from 1987), as well as three Fort Worth Court of Appeals cases: American Petroleum Exchange, Inc. v. Lord, 399 S.W.2d 213 (Tex. App.—Fort Worth 1966) (where the court allowed creditors to reach corporate assets to satisfy an individual debtor's liability where the individual debtor owned the great majority of the stock and treated the corporation as his alter ego);⁸

⁸The precise facts of American Petroleum are as follows: Plaintiff obtained a judgment against Sam Major for approximately $13,000 and began collection efforts including filing of an abstract of judgment and seizing property of Sam Major. An appeal was taken. Various procedural issues were raised in the appeal of the judgment. One of them involved the propriety of American Petroleum Exchange, Inc. ("APE") having been named as a defendant in the litigation—the reason alleged was that Sam Major had transferred various property to APE and it was alleged that APE was the alter ego of Sam Major—specifically, they were "one and the same" and any property of APE should be subject to execution to satisfy the judgment of plaintiff against Major. As to this issue, the Fort Worth appellate court noted that the evidence was that Major owned "the great majority of the stock in the corporation, and as trustee for his daughter held nearly all

Dillingham v. Dillingham, 434 S.W.2d 459 (Tex. App.—Fort Worth 1968) (a divorce case involving division of marital property where assets and earnings of a corporation were treated as though they were those of an individual spouse);⁹ Zisblatt v. Zisblatt, 693 S.W.2d 944 (Tex. App. Ft. Worth 1985) (same).¹⁰ The Fifth the remainder. There were very few shares in two or three individuals. At all material times, and up to the time of the trial below, Major (as practically the sole owner) treated the corporation as his alter ego. The corporation did not exist except as the shadow of his personality." The court held that the record was sufficient to disregard the corporate fiction and to declare the liability as to both Major and/or APE. The court opinion cites no authority except 14 Tex. Jur. 2d p. 128, et seq., regarding "Corporations." The term "reverse piercing" was never used.

⁹The precise facts of this case are as follows: the case involved a property division award issued in a divorce action. The husband had used his wholly-owned corporation, whose stock was apparently his separate property, as his alter ego or "instrumentality" to conduct business affairs. Additionally, there had been a commingling of the community property of the marriage with the corporate property, such that any segregation was "impractical or impossible." Appellate court affirmed divorce court's decision, holding that the increase in the corporate property became part of the parties' community estate and that wife should be awarded a portion of corporation's assets as part of the divorce property settlement. No authority was cited and there was no analysis. The term "reverse piercing" was never used.

¹⁰The precise facts of Zisblatt are as follow: the case involved an appeal in a divorce case. In cross petitions for divorce, the wife filed a third party action against Dispo, a corporation owned by the husband prior to and during marriage, to seek a determination that it was the alter ego of husband and the corporate assets should be considered community assets subject to division. Husband was a manufacturer's representative selling products. Dispo was basically a series of accounts into which were deposited the majority of commissions earned by the husband over the course of the marriage. Dispo then paid a salary to the husband. Dispo held significant cash assets at the time of the Circuit also acknowledged that the reverse piercing doctrine had been applied in certain federal tax cases.

In summary, although the Fifth Circuit noted that there was no Texas Supreme Court case at the time, and cited, frankly, rather spotty authority for the proposition, it indicated and accepted that Texas common law allows a creditor of an individual to reach the assets of a corporation to pay its claim upon a showing that there is an alter ego relationship between the individual and the corporation.¹¹ Id. at 244. However, the Fifth Circuit in Zahra (unlike the district court below it, whose order the Fifth Circuit vacated) held that the individual must divorce. Dispo also bought the house the couple lived in, paid the mortgage payments, and the couple paid Dispo rent. Dispo owned cars the couple drove. The couple literally owned nothing more than the clothes on their backs. The corporation had another nominal shareholder, the husband's sister, but the evidence suggested this was a sham ownership—for which the sister paid no consideration and the sister had no meaningful knowledge about the business of the corporation. The trial court denied the third party action and appellate court concluded this was reversible error. This opinion contained a lengthy discussion of alter ego (citing the traditional alter ego theories) and noted that the concept had been applied in divorce actions. The term "reverse piercing" never was used.

¹¹The Fifth Circuit further suggested that a finding of alter ego would be appropriate "where a corporation is organized and operated as a mere tool or business conduit" for another entity, considering the following factors: "the total dealings of the corporation and the individual, including the degree to which corporate formalities have been followed and corporate and individual property have been kept separately, the amount of financial interest, ownership and control the individual maintains over the corporation, and whether the corporation has been used for personal purposes." Id. at 245.

have a de facto ownership interest in the corporation to be its alter ego. In Zahra, the individual appeared not to have a direct ownership in the corporation involved but, rather, a possible interest in a trust that, in turn, had an interest in the corporation. The Fifth Circuit remanded for the district court to explore from the record whether the individual might have had the equivalent of an ownership interest in the corporation.

4. The Morphing of Reverse Corporate Veil Piercing into a Remedy Frequently Acknowledged.

It seems as though the remedy of reverse corporate veil piercing has gained more credibility with time, picking up steam, by virtue of its continued acknowledgment as a viable doctrine in certain Fifth Circuit opinions (although never with much analysis—as there has never been much need for analysis). The Fifth Circuit has acknowledged the doctrine on at least three separate occasions since Zahra: Permian Petroleum Co. v. Petroleos Mexicanos, 934 F.2d 635, 644 (5th Cir. 1991) (court once again discussed not just the alter ego doctrine and Castleberry, but also its opinion in Zahra and reverse veil piercing; while acknowledging that Zahra recognized reverse veil piercing, the discussion is dicta, as the court ultimately determined that the alter ego doctrine did not apply in this case to permit veil piercing, and instead determined that the separate doctrine of “sham to perpetrate a fraud” applied—which, citing

Castleberry at 273, the Fifth Circuit indicated is an equitable doctrine under Texas law "to prevent use of the corporate entity as a cloak for fraud or illegality or to work an injustice . . ."); Schimmelpenninck v. Byrne, 183 F.3d 347, 358 (5th Cir. 1999) (involved a creditor of a debtor bringing a reverse piercing action against a wholly-owned subsidiary of the debtor to recover his contractual claims against the assets of the subsidiary under alter ego theories; the Fifth Circuit's opinion revolves around standing, i.e., who had the standing to pursue the action—the creditor individually or the curator of the debtor's estate; however, the Fifth Circuit did briefly address the notion of reverse piercing and once again stated that Texas jurisprudence has recognized the doctrine of reverse piercing for over thirty years, citing Zahra and the three Fort Worth appellate court cases cited in Zahra; the Circuit Court also refuted an argument that an unpublished Southmark opinion may have stood for the proposition that reverse piercing is not available to an entity, or the estate of an entity, that abused the corporate form for its own benefit); Bollere S.A. v. Import Warehouse, Inc., 448 F.3d 317, 325 (5th Cir. 2006) (the Fifth Circuit's most recent discussion of reverse piercing—it was really not much of a discussion of reverse piercing, as the holding deals with improper use of the Texas Turnover statute to adjudicate substantive rights; however, in a discussion that is arguably dicta, the court acknowledged that the concept of reverse piercing exists under Texas common law, whereby creditors of an individual may reach a corporation's assets to satisfy the individual's liability to the creditors, when there is such a unity between corporation and individual that the separateness of the corporation has ceased and holding only the individual liable would result in injustice, citing Zahra and American Petroleum).

5. Troubling Aspects of the Reverse Corporate Veil Piercing Doctrine that Have Gone Unnoticed in this Jurisdiction, But Not in Other Circuits.

The court recites this history of Texas and Fifth Circuit jurisprudence regarding reverse corporate veil piercing because this court is troubled that the doctrine has evolved and become accepted into the mainstream, starkly during a time when the Texas Legislature is limiting the availability of traditional veil piercing, and without meaningful discussion of what, in substance, the doctrine does (and can potentially do). It is one thing to apply the reverse veil piercing doctrine in divorce property divisions, in the context of a small wholly-owned corporation (e.g., so that a spouse might get a more equitable division of marital property—where significant value is in a corporation wholly-owned by the other spouse). It seems quite another thing to broadly apply it in commercial litigation contexts (e.g., so that a creditor who loaned money to an individual, with only the legitimate expectation of being able to reach the individual's assets—including perhaps his stock in a corporation—is suddenly attempting to reach the assets of a corporation that might have its own significant creditors).¹² This court believes that reverse veil piercing—if generally applied without tight parameters—is a somewhat draconian remedy; it, without a doubt, essentially bypasses normal judgment-collection procedures that would permit a judgment creditor to attach the judgment debtor's shares in the corporation, but not the corporation's actual assets. See Cascade Energy & Metals Corp. v. Banks, 896 F.2d 1557, 1575-77 (10th Cir. 1990). The remedy arguably perverts established Bankruptcy Code priorities and state law creditor rights provisions, by putting creditors of an individual shareholder on a parity with creditors of the corporation (when logic suggests they should, at best, merely step into the shoes of the individual shareholder vis-a-vis the corporation—not share pari passu with the corporation's preexisting creditors). In the typical situation in which the doctrine has been used—situations involving a wholly-owned corporation or where there was apparently no nonculpable stakeholders or creditors of the corporation affected—it is not necessarily problematic. But this court fears that parties and courts may be expanding their view of the availability of the reverse veil piercing remedy, without meaningfully considering all of the due process rights of the preexisting creditors of the corporation that may be affected.

¹² Creditors who might have lent to the corporation only after undertaking due diligence as to what other creditors the corporation had, so that the creditor could assess risk and credit terms accordingly.

*Thus, in the absence of any Texas Supreme Court case clearly adopting reverse veil piercing, and in the absence of Texas or Fifth Circuit authority that clearly defines the specific parameters for its use,*¹³ this court will incorporate for the case at bar the views expressed by certain courts from other circuits—namely, that reverse veil piercing should only be applied when it is clear that it will not prejudice non-culpable shareholders or other stakeholders (such as creditors) of a corporation. See Stoebner v. Lingenfelter, 115 F.3d 576, 579–580 (8th Cir. 1997) (indicating that Minnesota has only recognized the doctrine of reverse corporate piercing in very limited circumstances—namely, when no shareholder or creditor would be adversely affected); Scholes v. Lehmann, 56 F.3d 750, 758 (7th Cir. 1995) (indicating without citations that “[r]everse piercing is ordinarily possible only in one-man corporations, since if there is more than one shareholder the seizing of corporation’s assets to pay a shareholder's debts would be wrong to the other shareholders. Even in one-man corporations it is a rarity because a simple transfer of the indebted shareholder's stock to his creditors will usually give them all they could get from seizing the assets directly."); Cascade Energy & Metals Corp. v. Banks, 896 F.2d at 1575 (analyzing Utah law, suggesting that the reverse piercing doctrine was "little recognized" and presents many problems—namely it bypasses normal judgment collection procedures whereby a judgment creditor can simply attach the judgment-debtor's shares in the corporation and not the corporation's assets; ultimately refusing to apply the doctrine in the absence of a clear statement from the Utah Supreme Court adopting it).¹⁴

The approach herein suggested by this court (of only considering reverse veil piercing if the facts clearly show it will not prejudice nonculpable stakeholders) not only respects due process and established creditors rights principles, but also gives proper deference to the will of the Texas Legislature—i.e., to impose a measured use of alter ego doctrine.

6. Application to the Facts at Bar: The Plaintiffs' Count for Reverse Veil Piercing Cannot be Dismissed as a Matter of Law.

So where does this leave the court in the case at bar? First, this court is bound under Zahra and its progeny cited herein to rule that Texas recognizes the remedy of reverse corporate veil piercing. Second, this court also is bound by Zahra to conclude that while there must be an ownership interest between an individual and the corporation whose separateness is sought to be disregarded, it is possible that such ownership might exist indirectly or implicitly—such as where the actual record holder of the shares of the corporation holds them as a sham for the individual. Thus, summary judgment is denied in the case at bar since there is a material question of fact as to whether Mr. Moore is a de facto shareholder of JHM Properties, Inc. (is Mrs. Moore's separate property interest in JHM Properties, Inc. really her separate property or not?) and, assuming this hurdle is met, there is another material fact question whether JHM Properties, Inc. is the alter ego of Mr. Moore, so that Mr. Moore (not JHM Properties, Inc.) is the de facto equity interest owner of Brunswick. Third, assuming these factual hurdles can be met (to show de facto ownership by Mr. Moore), the court will also consider at trial the general standards suggested by the Fifth Circuit in Zahra for a finding of alter ego and application of reverse piercing: "where a corporation is organized and operated as a mere tool or business conduit" for another, considering "the total dealings of the corporation and the individual, including the degree to which corporate formalities have been followed and corporate and individual property have been kept separately, the amount of financial interest, ownership and control the individual maintains over the corporation, and whether the corporation has been used for personal purposes." Id. at 245. Finally, the court will consider at trial whether applying reverse veil piercing as to Brunswick would prejudice non-culpable shareholders or other stakeholders (such as creditors) of Brunswick. Brunswick has argued that, since there are two other equity owners of Brunswick (other than JHM Properties, Inc.) Brunswick is entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law. But there is simply nothing in the law in Texas that per se prohibits reverse piercing when there are other equity owners. The court views this argument to raise a fact question—that question being whether the other shareholders or other stakeholders (such as creditors) of Brunswick would be prejudiced or harmed by the imposition of reverse corporate veil piercing as to Brunswick. While logic may suggest that they surely would be, evidence, not logic, is necessary on this point.

C. Constructive Trust

The court will address briefly the less difficult question of whether summary judgment is appropriate on the constructive fraud count.

The elements of constructive trust under Texas law are: (1) breach of a fiduciary relationship or, in the alternative, actual fraud, (2) unjust enrichment of the wrongdoer, and (3) tracing of the property to an identifiable res. In re Southmark Corp., 49 F.3d 1111, 1118 n. 31 (5th Cir. 1995). Constructive trust is an equitable remedy to prevent unjust enrichment resulting from an unconscionable act. Id. at 1118. There must be proof of actual or constructive fraud. Id.

Brunswick's arguments in support of summary judgment concerning constructive trust are fairly simple. First, Brunswick argues that there is no fiduciary relationship between Brunswick and Cadle/Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs provide no real counter argument to this assertion. However, this is not fatal to Plaintiffs, since it is possible to establish a constructive trust without there being a fiduciary relationship (i.e., if there was a fraud). Brunswick asserts that it is impossible for Brunswick to have defrauded Cadle because Brunswick was created five years after the judgment which Cadle seeks to collect and the Plaintiffs have provided no evidence that Brunswick did anything to defraud Mr. Moore's creditors. The court finds this argument somewhat nonsensical because it would seem to imply that a person could simply, the day after a judgment is entered against him, create a corporate entity into which he dumps all of his corporate assets and, because the corporate entity was created after the judgment was entered, the creditors could do nothing about it. The question of a fraud is obviously intensely factual and the court cannot say as a matter of law that Plaintiffs cannot establish it.

Additionally, Brunswick asserts that there is no identifiable res upon which to impress a constructive trust. With regard to this and all of Brunswick's arguments refuting constructive trust, it misses an essential fact. If the Plaintiffs can show the court at trial that Brunswick is the alter ego of Mr. Moore (and otherwise meet the elements to be entitled to reverse piercing), then the Plaintiffs will have the footing to argue that Brunswick's assets are Mr. Moore's assets and should be impressed with a constructive trust. As this court sees it, the constructive trust remedy rests, at least in part, upon the reverse alter-ego remedy.¹⁵ Because there remains a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Brunswick is Mr. Moore's alter ego, there also remains a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Brunswick's assets should be impressed with a constructive trust in favor of Mr. Moore's creditors.

Finally, Brunswick asserts that Brunswick was not unjustly enriched by Mr. Moore's self-dealing (in fact, Brunswick asserts that it was depleted by Mr. Moore's actions), such that imposition of a constructive trust in favor of Mr. Moore's creditors on Brunswick's assets is not appropriate. The Plaintiffs counter that Mr. Moore transferred the following assets to Brunswick without any consideration, unjustly enriching himself and Brunswick: the Emerson Property, the Brookside Property, $129,000 in settlement proceeds from Colorado lawsuit, and the $500,000 promissory note. The Plaintiffs assert that these issues raise at least a material fact as to whether there was unjust enrichment so summary judgment must be denied. But Brunswick further asserts that Moore acquired the Emerson Property, the Brookside Property, and the Promissory note as nominee or agent for Brunswick such that nothing of value was transferred from Moore to Brunswick. This back and forth is an apt demonstration of a "genuine issue of material fact."

The court believes that the issue of whether or not Mr. Moore transferred assets to Brunswick could be quite important, should the Plaintiffs be able to show that Brunswick is the alter ego of Mr. Moore. The question of these alleged transfers from Mr. Moore to Brunswick also involves issues of material fact, including what sort of interest Mr. Moore and Brunswick had in the Emerson Property, Brookside Property, and the promissory note; whether Brunswick was entitled to the Colorado lawsuit proceeds; and the facts surrounding the assignment of the $500,000 promissory note to Brunswick. Accordingly, the court must deny summary judgment on the question of constructive trust because genuine issues of material fact exist regarding these transfers.

D. Statute of Limitations

Finally, the court will dispose of Brunswick's statute of limitations argument. Brunswick asserts that the statutes of limitation applicable to the underlying causes of action/remedies should bar the Trustee (standing in the shoes of Cadle) from recovery. The statute of limitation on both fraudulent transfers and common law fraud in Texas is four years. Tex. Bus. & Comm. Code § 24.010(a)(1) (fraudulent transfers limitation period) and § 16.004 (common law fraud limitation period). However, the court believes that the limitations period for Cadle to enforce its judgment—and, therefore, for the Trustee to pursue these causes of action standing in Cadle's shoes—is longer than Brunswick suggests.

The most instructive case on this matter comes from the Texas Supreme Court: Matthews Const. Co., Inc. v. Rosen, 796 S.W.2d 692 (Tex. 1990). In Matthews Construction, the plaintiff was awarded a judgment against a company in 1982 and then filed a subsequent lawsuit in 1984 attempting to collect from the sole shareholder of a company on an alter ego theory. See id. In discussing whether or not the statute of limitations for the underlying cause of action should prevent the plaintiff from pursuing the alter ego claim, the Texas Supreme Court observed that the purpose of a statute of limitations is to "compel the asserting of a cause of action within a reasonable time so that the opposing party has a fair opportunity to defend while witnesses are available," and that the plaintiff's claim in pursuit of collection of his judgment was "not stale because [plaintiff had] already pursued to the claim to judgment." Id. at 694. Further, the court found that applying the statute of limitations for the underlying cause of action under such circumstances, "would fail to serve the underlying purpose of limitations and instead be a purely formal exercise." Id. "[I]f we were to apply limitations under these circumstances, it would effectively permit the corporate form to be used as 'a cloak for fraud,'" and the court would "not permit the law to be used for unlawful ends." Id.

The ultimate holding of the Matthews Construction case is narrow because it states only that "once [plaintiff] filed suit against [the company], limitations was tolled as to [the company's] alter ego until final judgment." Id. The opinion does not state whether the applicable statute of limitations would be four years for the underlying cause of action or ten years for a suit to enforce judgment. But the Texas Supreme Court does appear to hint that "the limitations period for . . . an alter ego suit would be the same as for a suit to enforce judgment." Id. at 694 n. 3. The statute of limitations for enforcing a judgment in Texas is ten years. Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem Code § 34.001.

The court believes that it is this ten year statute of limitations that applies to the Plaintiffs' pursuit of Brunswick as the alter ego of Mr. Moore in order to collect Cadle's judgment. This cause of action was filed on April 5, 2005 in state court, well with the ten year statute of limitations for collection on at least the November 2003 Cadle Judgment (if not the original 1992 FDIC Judgment later assigned to Cadle). Accordingly, the court will deny summary judgment as to Brunswick's statute of limitations defense.

IV. CONCLUSION AND ORDER

Based upon the foregoing, summary judgment to Brunswick is denied.

IT IS SO ORDERED.
